

Full Charge Ahead:

The Ram

In a world filled with so many barriers and limits, it can often be hard to leave an impact or create change. That's why when I think of power, I think not of those who sit in positions of power, but rather those who are willing enough to challenge those above them. In the first picture, we see a group of protestors demanding driver's license for undocumented immigrants. The people pictured have been protesting for months and have engaged in fasts, strikes, petitions and many other forms of protest to make the change happen. To me, their willpower is their power. Their determination to see it through, regardless of how long it takes is power in itself. They remind me of the rams that adorn the railings in the second picture. For rams often symbolize strength, persistence, initiative, and most importantly fierce determination. These protestors took the lead in making change happen. They didn't wait for progress to occur but rather they took matters into their own hands and took action. And I think this captures the idea of power perfectly because power to me is the ability to make change happen, and we all have that power. So the next time you want something to change in your life, don't be afraid to charge ahead and make it happen.
